Tip: Buy Supplies Before Bringing a New Puppy Into Your Home

You finally gave in to all of the pleading and promises to feed and walk a dog and you have agreed to buy a puppy. Congratulations! Now, you need to make some serious preparations before the big day arrives. Just what do you need to do before bringing a new puppy into your home? Prepare yourself. There is much to be done. For starters, the tip of the iceberg, you will need to invest in a good, solid puppy crate. Despite the devastated howls your new dog makes when you put him in his crate, he actually wants his own space so that he feels safe and cozy. He also needs a place to stay when you can't supervise him and he needs to have boundaries set for him. "This is your place, puppy." Leaving puppies out of their crates at night can mean cleaning up a huge mess in the morning and can prove fatal, as these little guys can find inventive ways to reach dangerous things, like electrical cords or chemicals, that seemed to be perfectly secure. Another thing you will need to consider is whether you will be walking your dog during potty breaks. If so, you will need a harness, leash and pooper scooper or poopy bags. Ideally, you will need a securely fenced area for your puppy to exercise in, but city dwellers do not always have this luxury. Don't forget food and water bowls, a washable puppy bed, sturdy toys, such as the Nylabone puppy starter kit, and quality puppy food. While you can buy everything else well ahead of time, avoid shopping for puppy food until you find out the brand of food your new dog is already eating. It is a very bad idea to switch food suddenly on a new puppy as it can cause intestinal problems for your new baby.

Tip: Children and Puppies - A Match Made in Heaven

Children and puppies go together like cookies and milk. They take adorable pictures together and can entertain each other for hours. However, there are a few things you should do to be sure your kids and your puppy have a safe and happy time when they hang out with each other. To be sure your dog and your child do well together, you should: Always supervise play time. Your child and your puppy are both too young to always behave appropriately with each other. If one or the other of them gets a bit carried away, you'll need to step in before the laughing and barking are replaced with tears or whimpers. Make sure your child knows the rules for interacting with animals. Discuss the fact that the puppy is much smaller and could be easily injured. Talk about how to properly hold a dog and have your child practice with a stuffed toy. Provide the puppy with plenty of chew toys and limit play time to short intervals to lessen the likelihood that it will become overly nippy while it is playing. Puppies become wound up and misbehave when they are overtired, just as children do. Search for child friendly breeds using a site like puppyfind.com.

Tip: Deworming Puppies

When you look at that roly poly little puppy, it doesn't seem possible that it could have any problems with worms. After all, the puppy's mother seems like a very healthy, well cared for dog and worms only happen to dirty, neglected dogs, right? Actually, many veterinarians say that becoming pregnant and giving birth can cause a dog to develop worms that were lying dormant in its system. These worms can be passed on to puppies. Because of this, deworming puppies routinely is often recommended by veterinarians. If your veterinarian wants to deworm your puppy, you may want to ask for a fecal exam instead, since there is no sense in giving medication to a puppy that doesn't need it. This exam shows the vet exactly which, if any, worms your dog has in its system. Often, by the time a puppy is eight weeks, it has already been wormed by the breeder's veterinarian and is worm free. Some veterinarians have discontinued routine worming because certain heartworm preventative medications claim to also kill roundworms and hookworms. They prescribe the heartworm medication and say that will take care of all worm problems. Others say that a preventative is no replacement for treatment of an infected dog. If you are concerned about worms, ask your veterinarian if your puppy's heartworm preventative can treat other types of worms.

Tip: Puppy Disease Prevention for Lyme Disease

Lyme disease, named for the town of Lyme, Connecticut, is a particularly nasty tick borne illness that affects people and pets. If your dog will be hiking through the woods with you, romping in the grass, or doing other outdoor activities, you should worry about Lyme disease. Luckily, puppy disease prevention for this nasty illness is actually quite simple. To protect your puppy, you should: Always check for ticks after time spent outdoors. Deer ticks are the culprits that carry Lyme and they are very small, so look closely. Don't forget to examine your dog's ears, muzzle and belly. Use a flea and tick preventative on your puppy as soon as your veterinarian says he or she is old enough. Your vet should recommend a medication that will kill ticks within a few hours of contact. This way, any ticks you overlook will be dead before they are able to infect your puppy, since Lyme disease usually doesn't pass to the victim for 24 hours or more after he or she is bitten. Ask your vet to test for Lyme disease if your puppy seems to have sore joints and a fever. The chance of complete recovery is highest if you catch the disease soon after it develops.

Tip: Avoid Problems With Shipping a Puppy

The thought of shipping a puppy can be a bit scary because there is no one sitting back in the cargo area with your new baby during the actual travel time. Amazingly enough, with all the potential problems, few puppies have a problem getting from point A to point B. However, it is a good idea to do all you can to minimize delays, mistakes and accidents. To do your best to be sure your puppy arrives happy and healthy, you should: Ask the breeder to get a Bordetella vaccine for your puppy, even if it is not required. Usually, there is more than one dog being shipped at the same time and they don't all come from the same kennel. This means that there is a very real chance that an unvaccinated puppy could develop this annoying condition. While it is easily curable, who wants to have to put a new puppy through the trauma of a vet visit and daily medication when the whole thing could be prevented by one simple shot? Request that the breeder double check to be sure the puppy is crated securely. Most airlines provide plastic ties to secure the door at all four corners. If it isn't required by the airline your breeder is using, this is still a smart idea, as sometimes a door can be jarred enough to pop open if it is simply latched. Check to be sure food and water dishes are being provided and make sure the breeder attaches a supply of food to the outside of the kennel so the puppy can be fed and watered if the trip is a long one. Ask that your phone number be written directly on the carrier in permanent marker in case the shipping information gets separated from the kennel.

Tip: How Much Does it Cost to Ship a Puppy by Air?

You've decided on the perfect dog breed for your family, but there aren't any puppies locally. Luckily, you searched puppyfind.com and found a breeder with a litter of puppies. You've talked to the breeder and are very comfortable with his or her philosophy and the photos of the puppies. However, you are not interested in driving halfway across the country to pick the new puppy up. Before you make the final commitment to buy your new family member, you need to know the cost to ship a puppy. The answer to this question is based on several factors, including breeder policies. Some breeders include the extra fees associated with shipping in the price of the puppy. Others will expect to have you pay for them. You will need a health certificate. A health certificate can cost anywhere from $40 to $60. If the puppy isn't up to date on shots, the vet will have to update vaccinations, which will make the price of the health certificate a bit higher. The puppy will have to be shipped in an airline approved kennel. If your breeder can strike a deal with a wholesaler and chooses to pass on the savings to new puppy owners, the cost can be as low as $40 for a small puppy's crate. It can be as high as $100 for a crate that was purchased from the local pet store. Actual shipping costs are controlled by the airline. You'll be limited by which planes fly from one destination to the other. Estimate $200-$350 for your puppy's airfare.

Tip: Shipping Puppies Using a Pet Transportation Service

You were searching for a puppy through puppyfind.com and you found the perfect match. However, the breeder is hesitant to ship, either because the kennel is not located near an airport or because the breeder just has never done this before and is unsure about all the procedures involved. You'll have to fly out to the breeder's location, pick up the puppy and take it home. The trip will be costly and you'll still have to figure out all the ins and outs of shipping. Should you just give up and buy a puppy that isn't quite right for you and your family? Before you get too discouraged, there is another option. You can look into shipping puppies using a pet transportation service. A pet transportation service can be used to handle the entire shipping process, from pick up at the breeder's kennel to delivery to your front door. You can also just have the service help you with part of the trip. For example, the service could pick the puppy up and deliver it to the airline, where it is shipped to your airport. From there, you could claim your puppy and take it home yourself. Some of these transporters also offer consulting services. They'll help you figure out how to ship your puppy and recommend the best airline and plane flight, while you and the breeder do the actual driving to and from airports on both ends.

Tip: Transporting Puppies by Air

Transporting puppies by air is the most popular method of getting them from the breeder to their new owner when they are not bred locally. Although the list of rules and regulations that are given may seem endless, they have been created to keep your puppy safe during its journey to your home. During hotter or colder weather, most airlines refuse to ship live animals for their safety. You may find that you cannot use airlines to ship your puppy during late Spring, Summer and early Fall months. The breeder is not simply trying to make money on the puppy's kennel by requiring you to buy a specific model for shipping. Any puppy that is shipped will be required to have a secure kennel. This protects the puppy from escaping and gives proper ventilation. The kennel cannot be collapsible and must allow air to circulate from several spots. These regulations are important because of the way cargo holds are packed. You will need to be sure the puppy is picked up in a timely fashion once it arrives. A long delay causes unnecessary stress on the puppy and could result in the puppy being returned to the breeder or a call to the local SPCA.

Tip: Find Local Puppies For Sale Online

You keep hearing that you can find puppies for sale online. However, you don't want to buy a puppy without seeing it and the parents in person (or dog) to be sure you really are going to be happy with its looks and personality. This means that searching for a puppy online is out of the question, right? Actually, it is still an excellent option, especially if you go to a site like puppyfind.com, which makes regional searches simple. Choose the dog breed you want to buy. If you aren't sure which breed is right for you, the site should offer search options to help you narrow the choices down. For example, puppyfind.com lets you search by size or upkeep. From there, you can choose a breed that strikes your fancy. Refine your search by limiting results to puppies in a specific state. If you don't find any puppies in your state, consider searching again in a nearby state. Unless you live in the middle of Texas, which is one big state to get across, nearby states are probably an hour or less from your location. It can be well worth a slight drive to get a puppy that is right for you and your family.

Tip: Primary Information to Have When Considering Buying a Puppy Online

Puppies for sale online may interest you, particularly if the breed you want is difficult to find locally. However, always remember that a new puppy will be a valued member of your family for ten years or more. Just as you wouldn't consider adopting a child online without a thorough and exhausting investigation, you should perform due diligence in your search for puppies for sale online. Here are some important things to do when you consider buying a puppy online. Verify that the puppy for sale is offered by a valid, reliable seller. Get the seller's name, address, and phone number. Also, check with the Better Business Bureau (for consumer complaints) and any other third party source that can verify the seller's legitimacy. Request a current health certificate from a qualified veterinarian that confirms all inoculations, treatments, and health conditions of the puppies online that you're considering. Verify that the veterinarian is respected in his/her practice area. Request a full money back guarantee in writing from the seller in advance. This document should explicitly specify the puppy for sale, his/her breed, health condition, and delivery date. To protect yourself, use an online escrow service to hold your funds until you've received your new puppy and have had your own veterinarian perform an examination to verify his/her good health. Only after you've met your new furry friend and know he/she is healthy will you authorize release of your funds to the seller. Learning how to buy a puppy online involves meaningful research to help you feel comfortable with the breeder/seller, the puppy's pedigree (ask for his/her AKC registration information in advance if you're buying a purebred dog), and your new family member's health. You'll feel better about your adoption and protect yourself, too.

Tip: Puppy Training Classes

Your puppy knows how to sit and come. He knows the basics of heeling. So, why would you want to bother with puppy training classes? There are several great reasons to take classes, even if your puppy has learned the basics. One of the most important purposes of a puppy training class has nothing to do with obedience commands. These classes help puppies learn important socialization skills. They have to learn to get along with other dogs, they are exposed to strange smells and noises and they get fussed over by a bunch of puppy lovers. Socialization can mean the difference between owning a weird dog that hides under stuff and an outgoing, jolly friend that loves company. Puppies have to obey commands with all kinds of other dogs and people around. Classes provide an environment chock full of distractions. If your puppy obeys commands during classes, he or she will obey them in the park or while romping in the yard. Beginning obedience classes could be the start of a lifelong love of learning for your dog. If he or she picks up commands quickly and seems eager to learn, you may just find yourself entering obedience and agility competitions together in the future.

Tip: Care Level for an Akita Puppy

Originally little-known, the Akita rose in popularity in the middle of the 20th century. In 1937, an Akita became the famous Helen Keller's guide dog. Just a few years later, after World War II, many American soldiers brought Akitas home from Japan. While still rather rare in the U.S., they are treasured by their owners worldwide. When looking for Akita puppies for sale, be sure you are dealing with a dedicated and honest breeder. Be aware that your little fluff ball will grow to around 28 inches tall and weigh up to or more than 100 pounds. Any dog that size needs extra care, but the Akita's dual coat — outer coarse and inner soft — needs only occasional brushing. They will shed their coats twice a year so be prepared for some occasional “hair issues.” Otherwise, you should only need to brush your Akita about once per week to remove his/her dead hair. Remember to trim your Akita's webbed paws — they are good swimmers — occasionally to keep them neat. The care challenge comes from their temperament and size. Your Akita puppy needs a firm training regimen. They are natural pack leaders, which doesn't work in a home and family setting. Therefore, you need to establish yourself as the pack leader and establish your home's ground rules as quickly and as firmly as possible. You want your Akita to be non-aggressive with your family and other pets while maintaining his/her natural protectiveness, which makes them very effective guard dogs. It's a good idea to teach your children to exhibit leadership behavior so they too can interface and enjoy your Akita puppy successfully.

Tip: Considering Temperament of Doberman Pinscher Puppies For Sale

Despite those movies that show people fleeing from vicious attack Dobermans, these dogs are usually wonderful family pets and the children in the family know that their huge, scary looking dog is actually a marshmallow where they are concerned. Many people who are looking for Doberman Pinscher puppies for sale are interested in finding a dog that will defend its family if they are faced with danger, but will also be quite happy to don some dress up clothes and have tea with the kids. As you look for a Doberman puppy, think about the way ads are worded. If the emphasis is on the dog's ability to attack intruders, you may want to keep looking. Yes, Dobermans are usually great pets, but you don't want to look for a family dog that was bred with the emphasis on aggression. Instead, look for an ad that emphasizes temperament and loyalty. If you do want a dog that is more protector than friend, consider buying a Doberman that was properly trained to be a guard dog. Ask for references and follow up to make sure the other dogs the breeder sold are well adjusted animals and safe to be around.

Unfortunately, not every person who trains Dobermans does so in a way that creates a loyal, devoted dog.

Tip: Some Health Concerns With Great Dane Puppies

Noble, dignified, sweet, and affectionate, the Great Dane is the giant of the dog world, sometimes weighing up to 200 pounds. They tend to love everyone and will only become aggressive in certain circumstances — usually when it is appropriate. When you search for Great Dane puppies for sale, take care to find a dedicated breeder. Less than careful breeding over the years has created some Great Dane puppies that may be prone to suffer some natural health concerns in the breed. Among those to be addressed: Tendency to have shorter lifespans. The statistical average is under ten years, although many well-bred Great Dane puppies can live for 12 to 13 years. Along with hip dysplasia, common to many larger breeds, the Great Dane can also be subject to heart disease, bloat, and tumors (often benign). This is one reason you should only consider Great Dane puppies for sale offered by reputable breeders, since they tend to be more concerned with the breed than the income they generate. Although the Great Dane needs lots of exercise, because of their unusual physique avoid jogging with your puppy until he/she is at least one year old. Their tendency to experience bloat also mandates that, even with adult dogs, you should avoid strenuous exercise immediately after a meal. Consider raising their food bowl to help avoid the possibility of bloat. Buying your Great Dane puppy from a concerned breeder can eliminate or, at least, reduce some of these health concerns. Their temperament and nobility make this gentle giant a wonderful companion and family dog.

Tip: Some Important Traits of Labrador Retriever Puppies

Affectionate, loving, gentle, highly intelligent, and loyal, Labrador Retrievers have a similar temperament to their cousin, the Golden Retriever. Whether you're looking for Labrador Retriever puppies for sale to find a wonderful hunting companion or for that perfect four-legged family member, be sure to deal with a trusted, committed breeder. The incredible popularity of the Labrador Retriever, consistently finishing in the top five most registered dogs of the year, has spawned many sellers that don't understand the breed. There are actually two types of Labrador Retriever, the English variety (more stocky and "laid back") and the American type (more lean and leggy). Both share most of the wonderful traits of the Labrador Retriever, including the love of play, swimming at every opportunity, hunger to learn and do a job, and gentleness with children, adults, and seniors. The American variety needs a bit more exercise to keep them from becoming high-strung and rowdy, however. Both varieties can run for extended periods of time. Unless you are a marathoner, don't expect to outrun or out-endure your Labrador Retriever. If you are not prepared to enjoy a daily brisk walk or jog (or bicycle ride) with your Labrador Retriever puppy, be careful about the amount of food you give him/her. Without a long walk, romp through the back yard, or good swim daily, your Lab may tend to put on weight that is neither needed nor desired. At a "playing weight" of 70 to 75 pounds, your loving family member can reach 100 pounds rather quickly if allowed to become a couch potato. But, if you keep your black, chocolate, or yellow Labrador Retriever active, you will enjoy ten to twelve years of a loyal, loving, devoted companion.

Tip: Activity Levels a Cocker Spaniel Puppy Needs to Stay Healthy

Sensitive, cheerful, and loyal, Cocker Spaniels love to play. They are energetic and always want to be active. When you search for Cocker Spaniel puppies for sale, ask about their parents. Were they companion or hunting dogs? Do they have any common Cocker Spaniel health issues, like cataracts, glaucoma, or patella tendon problems? Were they indoor or outdoor dogs? This information may help determine the type of puppy you're considering and any special activity needs they might have. In all cases, your Cocker Spaniel needs you to give him/her lots of activity. Many experts recommend up to three walks per day and any other "freedom to run" time you can provide. A good sized fenced yard would be perfect to give your Cocker Spaniel the opportunity to run and play. Be careful to avoid thick brush – although your Cocker Spaniel may love it – because their long curly coat can easily become tangled. Their long, floppy ears can be particularly susceptible to nasty tangles. Since most Cocker Spaniels love to swim, any opportunity you can give your puppy to get this type of exercise is a good choice. Whether you want a family companion or an excellent hunting dog, your Cocker Spaniel needs activity to remain lean and mean. Although fairly easy to train, they can be a challenge to housebreak. Therefore, more outdoor activity via walks and runs you can provide may help you housebreak your Cocker

Spaniel puppy faster and easier.

Tip: Basset Hound Puppies For Sale

With their floppy ears, soulful eyes and droopy jowls, Basset Hounds have a tendency to make otherwise sane and rational people decide to get a puppy. However, no matter how adorable they look, these dogs are more than just a cute face. Before you decide to shop for Basset Hound puppies for sale, you may want to find out a bit more about this breed. A good place to start is a simple breed overview, such as the one on puppyfind.com. Read up on the pros and cons of the breed to be sure you know what your new dog's characteristics will be. You may also want to take a look at the AKC's website and breed club sites for more information. It is also a good idea to talk to people who own adult Basset Hounds. They may mention things that aren't in the breed profiles, such as a Basset's deep, howling bark or its stubborn streak that it disguises as a lack of intelligence that can fool even the least naive owner. It is hard to believe your dog knows how to sit and is simply pretending he doesn't understand when he looks at you with mournful eyes.

Tip: Beagle Puppies For Sale

As you sit and enjoy the serene evening unfolding around you, you mention that the only thing marring its perfection is the lack of a dog. Immediately, the kids pipe up with suggestions for different breeds. Next thing you know, you're browsing through the Beagle puppies for sale at puppyfind.com. However, you can't help but wonder if this is the right breed for your family. If you are looking for a playful, active dog that adores hanging out with the kids and your other dogs, you should love having a pet Beagle. These dogs are not ideal for people who have a very inactive lifestyle or who work long hours and don't have time to interact with their pets. Of course, no dog is perfect and the Beagle is no exception. If you live in an apartment or an area where homes are close together, you may find that you spend a lot of time worrying about keeping your dog from disturbing the neighbors. Beagles have a very carrying, deep bark so that their owners can find them easily while they are hunting together. In addition, Beagles tend to be a bit challenging to train. It isn't that they don't want to please their owners. They just have other things they want to do, like bunny chasing.

Tip: Beagles Are Superb With Children

Beagles and children were made for each other. Snoopy, the most famous Beagle (at least, with children and the cartoon world), is depicted as the classic Beagle – thoughtful, peaceful, empathetic, and loyal. Fortunately, "Peanuts" creator, Charles Schultz, infused Snoopy with a true Beagle personality. As you might expect, Beagles love to be outdoors, but they often do well in apartments, too. When searching for Beagle puppies for sale, find a breeder that understands and offers puppies that have the classic genetic characteristics of Beagles. They love the company of humans or other Beagles. They like children as much as other dogs to play with. When you search for Beagle puppies for sale, be aware that they are natural hunters. Therefore, while they have wonderful temperaments and are gentle, mixing them with non-canine animals may or may not work wonderfully. You should also be aware that Beagles have a very unusual bay/howl when they are in hunter mode. While not particularly loud or annoying, this trait may take a little getting used to. Always remember, even with a Beagle, typically wonderful with children and families, to introduce young children and all dog breeds properly. Children should be advised to be just as gentle and loving as you want your Beagle to be with them.

Tip: Brittany Puppies For Sale

Spaniels are working dogs that are eager to please, and Brittanys, despite the fact that they have been reclassified as a member of the setter group, still have a Spaniel's characteristics. For people who want a dog that is good natured, looking for Brittany puppies for sale is a smart idea. Brittanys do need some grooming. The long hair on their legs and ears is prone to matting if it is not brushed out at least weekly. These dogs want to be with their people, or at least another dog, at all times. If you are working one of those high pressure jobs, plan on shopping for two dogs. Having the dog walker come in twice a day just isn't enough companionship for this breed. If you don't have any interest in hiking or Frisbee throwing and your dog is an only child, be prepared for it to show its boredom by chewing up your shoe or your chair rungs. These dogs are wonderful pets, as long as they get some exercise and play time to release their energy. During burglaries, this breed is the type of dog that will helpfully mention the safe in the upstairs closet instead of defending the home. Brittany Spaniels are simply too sweet to guard anything.

Tip: Some Boston Terrier Traits You Should Know

Boston Terriers are interesting dogs, starting with the fact that they are not really terriers. Actually bred in Boston, they originally were much larger and, as much as we may frown on this, formerly well-known fighting dogs. In the late 1800s, they were "bred down" from around 40 pounds to their current smaller size (17 to 25 pounds). Don't be fooled by their small size, however. When you search for Boston Terrier puppies for sale, you are still considering tough, athletic dogs. They need both mental and physical exercise to prevent them from becoming bored and possibly getting cranky. Highly intelligent, Boston Terriers are typically easy to train, but don't be shy about asserting your authority. They respond well to a quiet, but firm hand. You can't afford to have your Boston Terrier believe he is the pack leader, as he/she will happily take over your household. Boston Terriers are usually great with children and extremely friendly to older people and most strangers. They may not be the best watchdogs, but their gentle temperament makes them great family pets and potentially wonderful therapy dogs. Their short-haired coat requires little grooming time and their gregarious personality requires only your love and attention to shine through.

Category: Puppy Registries

Subcategory: Puppy Registries

Tip: About the AKC Puppy Registry

For someone who doesn't know much about purebred dogs, all those initials are bewildering. Why do more than half the dog ads you look at say AKC on them? Should you be looking for ads that have those initials? AKC stands for the American Kennel Club, the oldest existing puppy registry in the United States. It is a way for people to keep track of pedigrees and try to improve their dog breed. The registry does not accept all dog breeds and not every purebred dog of a recognized breed is allowed to be registered by this organization. To have an AKC registered puppy, breeders need two AKC registered parents that do not have a limited registration. When the puppies are born, their breeder needs to send in a litter registration form which tells the AKC how many male and female puppies were born and what their colors are. The AKC sends back forms that are given to the puppies' buyers, who need to submit the forms, along with a fee to the AKC within the allowed time period. The AKC sends out the registration forms to the new owners, who now have proof that they own an AKC registered dog.

Tip: Buying Puppies That Are Not Registered With an American Puppy Registry

You've found your dream puppy. The whole family is excited, but you just realized the breeder didn't mention anything about the puppy being registered with an American puppy registry. Now, you are wondering if you should really still buy the puppy. After all, when puppies aren't registered, they are inferior, right? Actually, there are several reasons why a puppy isn't registered and most of them have nothing to do with the quality of the puppy. The best thing to do is to talk to the breeder about this issue. Some breeders feel that registering puppies encourages new owners to breed them. Usually, they didn't mean to breed their dogs and feel a bit guilty about the litter they accidentally had. The parents are beautiful dogs and the breeders have the parents' papers and will show them to buyers who ask to see them to be sure it is true that they are registered. They simply don't want people to make more puppies and will be neutering their own dogs to be sure they don't have more either. Designer dog breeds, while wonderful pets, are not accepted by puppy registries like the American Kennel Club. Many times, people who breed Goldendoodles, Schnoodles, or one of the other deliberate mixed breeds people want decide that they won't worry about finding a registry that does accept these dogs. Of course, there are bad reasons for not registering dogs, too. Some breeders don't care enough to make the effort. Others have been banned from the organization they used to use to register their puppies. Talk to the breeder and check references before you decide that no paper is no problem.

Tip: The ACA Puppy Registry - Health Trumps Appearance

If you are concerned about the potential health of your new puppy, you may want to look for a breeder who uses the American Canine Association's puppy registry. Unlike many other breed registries, the ACA seems to put less emphasis on the appearance of the dog's parents than it does on their health. When you look for an ACA registered litter, don't assume the parents are free of hereditary defects. Ask to see a copy of the ACA health form and look at the results listed. The ACA enables breeders to have dogs certified as being free from hip dysplasia, knee dysplasia, thyroid conditions and many other hereditary issues, but that doesn't mean the breeder has had all the tests done. If you are concerned with the appearance of your puppy, too, you will want to take a close look at the confirmation of the parents. Also, if this isn't the first litter of puppies, ask if there are pictures of older puppies from other litters. People who are delighted with their new puppies often send pictures of them to the breeder during milestone events over the first year or so. Seeing these puppies gives you a better idea of what your puppy will look like than looking at the parents, since the puppies are a combination of both parents' characteristics.

Tip: The CKC Puppy Registry

The Continental Kennel Club puppy registry is a bit different than some other registries. This organization doesn't just register litters of puppies. It also will register an adult dog that does not have registered parents. When you first hear this news, you may feel a bit anxious about buying a CKC registered puppy. However, these dogs that are registered as adults are actually more likely to resemble the breed standard than pet quality dogs that have several generations of registered dogs in their ancestry. To be registered by the CKC, a dog that was not registered before by any registry must be at least six months old. Two people have to agree that the dog has the proper breed characteristics and the owner has to include three photos of the dog from different angles so the registry can see that the dog does indeed look the way it should look. On the other hand, many dogs that are already registered simply because their parents were registered and the breeder submitted a litter registration are quite poor examples of the breed. In addition, this organization offers several very nice options, such as free litter registration and the ability to get your puppy micro chipped at the time of registration.

Category: Questions to Ask Breeders

Subcategory: Questions to Ask Breeders

Tip: Questions to Ask Dog Breeders

When you are shopping for a new puppy, the breeder's philosophy and kennel standards are almost as important as the actual animal you are buying. However, when you are shopping for a puppy long distance by using a service like puppyfind.com, it can be a bit of a challenge to get an accurate picture of what the breeder's standards are. This is why you should make a list of questions to ask dog breeders before you start actively looking for a puppy. One very important question to ask the breeder is exactly where the puppies are raised. Some puppies do not know what the inside of a house looks like, while others spend their first eight weeks in the kitchen or family room, surrounded by family. Since socialization is important for young puppies, the environment can make a big difference. Another good thing to ask about is the people the puppies interact with. Do they get plenty of playtime with kids or do they live in a home where they only see the breeder? If you have an active family, a puppy raised with kids should fit right in, while a puppy used to a quiet life will probably need some help adjusting.

Tip: Avoid Online Puppy Breeder Scams

As you search for a puppy, you may notice that some breeders are super accommodating. Door to door delivery with the entire payment up front by Western Union, next day delivery, or incredible low prices on beautiful looking puppies can all be signs that you are dealing with online puppy breeder scams. The best way to avoid scams is to realize that there is a reason this breeder is so helpful. That door to door delivery? The breeder, who doesn't actually own dogs at all and probably lives in a third world country, is going to take the money you wired through Western Union and go on a shopping spree. Instead of a new puppy, you will receive crushed dreams and a much emptier bank account. That beautiful puppy you are buying for a quarter of the price all the other breeders charge? You're looking at photos of some other breeder's puppy and will be getting a dog that actually looks more like a creation by Dr. Frankenstein. Protect yourself from common scams by: Asking the breeder to take a picture of the puppy you want to buy with a newspaper with that day's date on it prominently displayed in the photo. Requesting that the breeder accept payment through an escrow service, which offers you both protection during the transaction.

Tip: Avoiding Puppy Mills

As you search for the perfect puppy, you'll probably come across one of the most deplorable things about dog breeding - puppy mills. Unlike show or hobby breeders, puppy mills breed large numbers of dogs in less than ideal situations in order to make money. Often the parent dogs are poor specimens of the breed, since reputable breeders try to make it hard for puppy mills to get their puppies for breeding stock. Luckily, there are several tips for avoiding puppy mills. Ask plenty of questions. After you get answers, ask more questions. Many times, a puppy mill owner trying to pass as a small breeder will let something slip that will give you a clue that the puppies you are considering were raised in the puppy mill. Make sure you have the kennel's name and call the Better Business Bureau for that state to ask about complaints. Run a search for the name of the kennel online. If it has been in the news or is under investigation, something may just pop up in the search results. Go with your instincts. If you feel uneasy about the breeder, keep looking until you find a breeder you don't feel uneasy about.

Tip: Online Dog Breeder Scams

You've heard to be wary of online dog breeder scams if you search for your new puppy online, but you have no idea how to identify scams. What are you supposed to be wary of here? There are actually several scams that involve puppy sales, but common sense and a bit of research can help you avoid most scammers. The most common scam involves cashier's checks. The seller, who often actually has no dogs at all, will tell you that someone he or she knows needs to have a cashier's check cashed. Stories range from the other person being stuck in Nigeria and being unable to get money out of the country because the government won't let it leave along with the person to the seller not having a bank account and needing to cash a check from a previous buyer. The check is usually for much more than the puppy's purchase price and the seller will say that you seem like an honest person and then will ask you to simply send the extra money with your purchase amount. Unfortunately, these checks are bad and you will soon find that your bank account is looking downright anemic because you are stuck covering the bad check.

Tip: Are Puppy Vaccinations Necessary for Indoor Dogs?

If you buy a toy dog breed, you may be wondering if puppy vaccinations are really necessary. After all, your little Fifi will never actually set foot out the front door, so it isn't like she is exposed to constant viruses. Why bother with vaccinations when you aren't going for a walk around the block together? Actually, unless you and your puppy are planning to take up permanent residence in a bubble, you should be sure you get the basic vaccinations. Your shoes, your coat, your purse, the kids' backpacks, grocery bags, packages and a whole host of other items are potential germ carriers. No matter how little and cute your puppy is, he or she will probably still be a bit of a chewer and could pick up germs from these things. If you go on vacation or you have an emergency situation, such as a house fire, it is also important to have a dog with updated vaccinations. If you have to put your dog in a kennel at the last minute, you won't be allowed to drop it off without having a current Rabies, DHLPP and Bordatella shot. If you take your dog to the vet for smoke inhalation, you can certainly get treatment without an updated vaccination record, but your dog will have to be vaccinated during his or her stay to avoid getting a virus, which will add to an already stressful situation.

Tip: Pricing Puppy Checkups

You paid for your new puppy and he is settling in to the family as if he's always been there. Now comes the expensive part - vaccinations and preventative medications. Just like everything else, veterinary care costs are rising, so it is a smart idea to look into the price of puppy checkups at several different hospitals before you schedule your puppy's first appointment. The main thing you will need to remember as you ask for price quotes is to be sure that you are not comparing apples to oranges. Be sure to find out exactly what shots will be given during each visit. Ask if the quoted price is the price of the entire visit or just the shot. Many times, hospitals will give a quote for vaccinations and will leave out the additional charge for an office visit that they are planning to bill you for on each trip for shots. Another thing you will want to find out is whether the hospital will be giving the puppy heartworm and flea and tick preventatives on one of the visits. This helps you budget your money more effectively, since the medications can double the cost of a normal visit.

Tip: Puppy Checkups Shouldn't Be a Rush Job

You take your puppy in for its first puppy visit. Ten minutes later, you're both back in the car, feeling dazed and confused. What happened? Wasn't the visit supposed to take a bit longer? Unfortunately, few vets do the thorough puppy checkups that new owners expect to get. If your vet barely takes the time to check your puppy's eyes, ears and teeth before giving him or her that first shot, you may want to request a more in depth exam. Ask to have your puppy's heart checked and request that the vet make sure that your puppy doesn't have a hiatal hernia. If you are concerned about knee dysplasia, request that the vet look for any problems with the puppy's joints. While the vet should ask if you have any questions at least once during the visit, don't be afraid to ask them even if he or she doesn't make the offer to answer them. After all, unless you have a very unusual vet, you are paying for an office visit along with the shot and are entitled to a few extra minutes of your vet's time to be sure you know how to care for your puppy properly.

Tip: Veterinary Care for Puppies - Selecting a Vet

When you buy a new puppy, you are going to be taking quite a few trips to the vet for new puppy checks, shots and preventative medications. Since you will be spending so much time at the vet's office, it would be nice to find a vet you feel comfortable with. Before you need veterinary care for puppies, you should check out a few of your local veterinary offices to see which one you feel most comfortable with. Call each office to find out about hours and services. Make a note of how friendly the receptionist seems on the phone. If he or she doesn't seem to be patient and helpful with a possible new client, customers may receive even worse service. Go to each office. While staff probably won't give a tour of the building, you should be able to get a feel for the way things run by the waiting room. The area should be clean and welcoming and staff should be dressed professionally. Ask for fee information and vaccination schedules for puppies. Some vets prefer to give several shots at once, while others give shots one at a time, which means you'll be making quite a few more visits to the office.

Tip: Distemper Shots

Your vet says your puppy needs a whole series of distemper shots. He or she gives your puppy the first shot, gives you a schedule of vaccines and sets up the next appointment, which is two weeks away. You've heard of distemper before, but it isn't something serious like Rabies, right? You're going to be firm and tell the vet that you don't need a bunch of shots when you go in for that appointment in two weeks - just the Rabies vaccine. Actually, distemper is quite serious. While it is not dangerous to all the people in your household, the way Rabies is, it is usually fatal in puppies. In fact, distemper is such a risky virus that vets often will recommend that new puppy owners keep their puppies away from areas where other dogs hang out until they've had their shots. That means trips to the dog park or a visit to the local town festival with your new puppy in tow is a bad idea until he or she has finished the distemper shot series. If your puppy does show signs of illness, like being listless or feverish or just doesn't seem like it is acting right to you, take it to the vet to rule out distemper. The recovery rate for puppies with this lethal virus is about 20 percent and most of the puppies that recover will have some permanent side effects. Puppies diagnosed quickly have a much better chance of beating the disease than puppies that are sick for a week or two before the vet realizes they have distemper.

Tip: Preparing for Puppies First Shots

The first visit to the vet's office can be an ordeal for the new puppy and its owner, especially if the owner has never had a puppy before. The owner may be expecting a sterile environment without empathetic staff and may be anxious about the puppy's reaction to the whole visit. To prepare for puppies first shots and alleviate stress, new owners should: Bring the puppy into the office in a pet carrier. When it is older, it can walk in under its own steam, but you don't want an unvaccinated puppy walking across the same ground some very sick dogs have walked on. While veterinary staff will thoroughly clean all the surfaces in the building each day, the parking lot is another matter. Keep the puppy in the carrier until they enter the exam room. If a sick dog was just seen or is still in the exam room when you walk into the waiting room, it is a good idea to minimize contact with the ill animal. Have a copy of all the puppy's health records on hand. The vet will want to know what has already been done to care for your puppy's health. Relax. The staff will probably be so busy peering into the puppy's carrier and making a fuss over him or her that you won't have time to stress out during your visit.

Tip: Puppy Shot Schedule

When you get a puppy shot schedule, you may be a bit surprised at the frequency of the visits. With a return visit every two weeks until your puppy completes his vaccines at twelve or sixteen weeks old, you may be wondering if it would be easier to just rent out an exam room. Why do you need to come back so many times? Vets break the shots up for several reasons. Your puppy's shot schedule includes frequent visits over the first few weeks because: Some shots do not provide adequate protection without several vaccinations over a short period of time. This is often because the puppy's mother passed on antibodies that fight off the vaccine. Many puppies would really feel ill for several days if they received four immunizations in a single day. Breaking up the vaccines into a puppy shot schedule of a DHLPP vaccine and a second vaccine, such as Bordetella or Rabies, at each visit makes the whole experience less stressful for your puppy's immune system. Your wallet feels a bit less stress. Coming up with two hundred or more dollars at once is a challenge for many people. A small bill every two weeks is easier to manage.

Tip: Types of Puppy Vaccines

Your new puppy just received a shot schedule and you're feeling a bit overwhelmed by all those abbreviations and technical terms. What are the different puppy vaccines and which ones are necessary for your puppy's health? The DHLPP vaccine is actually a combination shot that is given several times at two week intervals to protect your puppy from viruses. It includes protection against canine distemper, hepatitis, leptospirosis, canine parainfluenza and parvovirus. This combination vaccine has to fight against the antibodies that the mother dog passed on to your puppy to get established. Because of this, the vaccine needs the booster series to allow it to really protect your puppy from this group of nasty viruses. The Bordetella vaccine protects your dog from kennel cough. This is an annoying, infectious cough that can spread quickly amongst unvaccinated dogs. While it is easily treatable, dogs can die from complications related to the virus, so it makes sense to get the shot, even if you don't plan to kennel your dog. A visit to the pet store can bring the virus home on your shoes. The Rabies vaccine is given at about twelve weeks and then is given a year later to provide three year protection. The Lyme vaccine is optional but is a good idea for areas with a heavy Lyme disease infection rate.

Tip: What Shots Do Puppies Need to Travel Abroad?

If you are taking your puppy overseas, you will need to make some preparations ahead of time. Besides getting a health certificate and checking quarantine laws to be sure you won't be back in your home country before you can take your dog into the country you are visiting, you will need to have the proper vaccines and identification. So, what shots do puppies need?

A Rabies vaccine is required by law. However, some countries have specific regulations about this shot, such as a 30 day waiting period between the day the shot was given and the day the puppy enters the country, so be sure you give yourself enough time. While they may not be required by the country you are traveling to, you will probably need to be sure DHLPP and Bordetella shots are also up to date, because your airline will want to see proof of current vaccines. Ask about any common diseases in the country you are visiting to be sure your puppy is protected. Don't forget to check into whether the country requires you to have your puppy microchipped and be sure you use a microchip approved by that country. Many countries overseas use a microchip that has a longer number than standard US microchips.

Tip: About Cairn Terrier Puppies for Sale

You've got your heart set on your very own Toto and plan to spend the next few years skipping down your yellow brick road to happiness. You've been searching for Cairn Terrier puppies for sale and can't wait to get one of these calm little dogs to carry around in your own basket. Before you buy a Cairn, you may want to do a bit of research into the breed so you aren't terribly unhappy with your new puppy. Yes, you probably can get your puppy to sit in a basket, as long as you play a ten hour game of fetch right beforehand. These guys are high-energy diggers and chewers, especially as puppies and are more into vermin hunting than lap sitting. Of course, they love to snuggle with their owners for awhile, but they aren't low-energy lapdogs. Cairns have powerful paws and tend to be on the hyper, strong-willed side as puppies. They think nothing of choosing a full grown Old English Sheepdog as their playmate and will become rowdy enough to make the larger, although better-behaved, dog decide to hide out in a safer spot. However, this breed does settle down as it matures and is incredibly devoted to its family. As long as you're not expecting a dog with a stuffed-toy personality, you will end up with a faithful, loving friend.

Tip: Chihuahua Puppies Are Not as Temperamental as They Are Sometimes

Portrayed

Loved by many and treated curiously by others, the misconception that the Chihuahua is temperamental – even ferocious – has no basis in the nature of the breed. Much like the undeserved negativism sometimes displayed toward the Doberman Pinscher, the Rottweiler, and the Pit Bull, most of their temperament issues, if they exist, are caused by the actions of the dog's owner(s), not the breed. There are a couple of reasons for this. First, they are very small dogs, typically ranging in weight from two to six pounds. Fortunately, they are very alert and quick. They can usually avoid being stepped on by mistake. Second, they are extremely courageous and strong-willed, so they need a strong, "pack leader" presence on the part of their owner(s). Lacking this leadership, the Chihuahua puppies you consider will take on the role of pack leader quickly. This invariably creates some problems. Along with running the household, they tend to become an overly-devoted protector to their primary handler, becoming suspicious and aggressive with everyone else, including family members. You might witness your formerly happy and loving Chihuahua puppy snarl, growl, and even snap at other family members, particularly children. Their small size and fragility make Chihuahua puppies a less than wonderful choice for a house with very young children, anyway. While sometimes a challenge to housebreak, Chihuahua puppies for sale will grow to be wonderful, obedient, and considerate family members as long as the owner establishes a pack leader position early in their puppy's life. There should be neither temperamental issues nor any other inappropriate behavior problems with a Chihuahua.

Tip: Finding the Right Bichon Frise Puppies for Sale

Your family is very allergy prone, so you've decided to play it safe and are looking for Bichon Frise puppies for sale. While it is true that no dog is really hypoallergenic, you've talked to enough people to know that Bichons cause fewer allergy attacks than most other breeds. Besides, these dogs are cute little bundles of energy and will be great with the kids. Now, the trick is to find a litter of puppies near you. You've searched the local papers and asked friends to keep an eye out but there is not a Bichon puppy in sight. Do you have to settle for one of those battery operated models from the toy store or will you be able to locate a real puppy? Luckily, sites like puppyfind.com make finding a Bichon breeder much easier. If you've been avoiding using one of these sites because you want to find a breeder close enough to drive to, then you'll be excited to know that you can limit your search to local breeders. If there isn't a breeder in your state, don't forget to check nearby states. Sometimes, a breeder with an available litter is just over the state line.

Tip: Havanese Puppies for Sale

You've decided to skip the cruise this year and buy a puppy instead. You fell in love with the Havanese, a cousin of the Bichon Frise, and once you saw that these dogs usually cost more than $2000, you decided to skip Christmas, too. Now, you are all ready to start looking for Havanese puppies for sale, but you can't find any local breeders. You've found a few puppies through puppyfind.com, but are a bit nervous about shipping a puppy that costs this much. To make sure you protect yourself from unethical breeders, you should take a few steps. When you are buying an expensive puppy, like the Havanese, it is a good idea to use an Escrow service. This service protects you and the seller, so an ethical seller will not object to using one. Ask about testing the parents have had for genetic problems. Some breeders respond by saying Havanese dogs do not need to be tested, because they have no problems. Walk away from the deal and look for a breeder who cares for the breed instead of someone who is obviously out to cash in on the breed's popularity and high price tag.

Tip: Lhasa Apso Puppies Are Good with Children and Families

Looking like a shrunken version of the Old English Sheepdog, Lhasa Apso puppies have a wonderful temperament. With their tendency to live long lives (up to 18 years) and relatively few breed-specific health concerns, the Lhasa Apso typically provides dedicated companionship to his/her owners. There is one caution. Selecting from Lhasa Apso puppies for sale is a wonderful choice assuming you do not allow your new addition to develop the dreaded "small dog syndrome." This occurs when the owner or other family members fail to exhibit the pack leader role. The Lhasa Apso is particularly susceptible to this attitude. Should you allow this to occur, you might find that your Lhasa Apso becomes suspicious of strangers and most children. They may become over-devoted to you at the exclusion of all others – humans and pets. This condition often generates other undesired behaviors, including separation anxiety, growling or snapping at children and strangers, and even becoming unnaturally aggressive with other dogs. This displays a combination of their pack leader status and belief that they must protect only you from all other living things. The syndrome can be totally avoided if you maintain an alpha personality consistently when training your Lhasa Apso puppy. Concentrating on developing proper behavior and socialization should bring out the best of his/her temperament. In so doing, you'll have a Lhasa Apso that is a wonderful family member, including their interrelationship with children and families.

Tip: Lhasa Apso Puppies for Sale

You're looking for a spunky, smaller dog that loves family life and isn't too delicate to play games with the kids. Someone mentioned the Lhasa Apso. You researched the breed and fell in love. A search of puppyfind.com revealed that there were breeders in your area, so you are ready to start looking at Lhasa Apso puppies for sale. However, you aren't quite sure what you should be looking for! Some Lhasa Apsos are more nervous than others. These dogs tend to dislike all the hubbub of family life, so make sure the puppies' parents are outgoing and friendly. Ask about hip dysplasia testing. This breed tends to have quite a few dogs with hip dysplasia, considering their small size. You should also find out if the parents have any kidney or stomach problems. If you want a dog that will excel in obedience competitions, you may want to look for a different breed. Lhasa Apsos aren't stupid, they just don't necessarily want to do what you want them to do. This can lead to some very embarrassing moments for the owner, who appears to be trying to compete with a dog that doesn't know how to sit, let alone do a long down.

Tip: Pomeranian Puppies for Sale

When you saw a Pomeranian, you simply fell in love with this spunky little breed. That sweet pixie face surrounded by a cloud of hair, a loving disposition and a willing attitude combined to make the perfect dog for you. A quick search at puppyfind.com showed you several Pomeranian puppies for sale in your area and you are headed out the door to get a puppy. Before you jump in the car, there are some things you should know about this special breed. Pomeranians may be small, but they have big attitudes. This breed was once a much larger dog and was used to herd in the tough Baltic climate. Their intelligence and spunk means these pint-sized pups are ideal watchdogs. They definitely know their own minds and can be stubborn. If you aren't at home much, this breed will be miserable. Poms need a ton of attention from their families. While some other breeds that crave attention are content with another dog, these little guys really do need their people to be around, too. There are quite a few health problems common to the breed, including heart defects, trachea problems and hypoglycemia. Epilepsy and knee dysplasia are also common disorders.

Tip: Some Lesser Known Traits of the Dachshund

What comes to mind when you think of a Dachshund? A hot dog? A wiener? A clown-like little dog? Wrong. Wrong. Wrong. These little guys have a long history of noble hunting for larger and dangerous Badgers. Strong, fearless, and muscular, Dachshunds have long been well-respected as diligent hunters, much like terriers. Actually, the Dachshund puppies for sale that you meet can "go to ground" with the best of the terriers, like the Cairn, if given the opportunity. Over the years, they have become companion dogs and have lost some of their respect as courageous hunters. However, leaving your Dachshund puppy alone in your back yard will likely produce some unwelcome digging and searching for prey. His/her chromosomes are what they are. Somewhat like the Yorkie, whose fearlessness and ability to tackle ferocious rodents equal to or greater in size, the Dachshund has been portrayed as something else by many human owners. While sometimes difficult to housebreak and always ready to take over a household, if you establish yourself as pack leader and give your Dachshund the ability to express themselves and play hunter, he/she will become a loyal, loving, and friendly family member. Socialization with other humans and/or pets needs to be started while your Dachshund puppy is young in order to prevent future over-protective and stubborn behavior.

Tip: Why Cairn Terriers Are Mistakenly Underrated

The background of the Cairn Terrier is one of the oldest of all the domesticated canines. One of the original dogs from Scotland, the Cairn Terrier was first recognized as a breed in the 1500s. The wonderful, lovable, and always mischievous Cairn Terrier has actually contributed to the breeds of their more famous cousins, the West Highland White, Scottish, and Skye Terriers. Their rugged, determined look and behavior seldom win them much acclaim at the top all-breed shows. However, when you look for Cairn Terrier puppies for sale, you're witnessing one of the canine champions of the Terrier (Go-to-Ground) trials, which are actually much more exciting. Still, their lack of "fluff" seems to hurt their popularity with some buyers. You'll never see a Cairn Terrier in a fashion model's purse. They are, however, among the best choices you could ever make. Along with a fierce devotion to their families, patient and playful with children, and a strong sense of independence, Cairn Terriers almost never shed, making them perfect companions for those with allergies. They do need some brushing, however, to keep their dual coat healthy. You can even have a happy Cairn Terrier puppy in an apartment, as they can adapt to almost any environment. They may be underrated, but never under-loved by (or totally loving of) their human family.

Tip: Diversify Bloodlines When You Buy Puppies Online

It seems like every single dog of your favorite breed in your area can be traced back to one local breeder. You have a very nice male puppy and he is really shaping up to be a gorgeous example of the breed. You've decided to start showing him and are interested in getting a female puppy to start your own kennel. However, you're pretty sure you should get some new blood into the lines. Where can you find an unrelated litter of puppies? One simple way to find a different bloodline is to buy puppies online. Since you will be trying to create your very own doggie dynasty, you will want to be particularly careful as you search for puppies. Find a site like puppyfind.com, which helps breeders include information on championship backgrounds and champion sires right on the classified listing for each puppy. If you want to show your new puppy, too, look for puppies that have show potential. Finding this information is as simple as looking at the classified listings. On puppyfind.com, a show quality puppy will be listed as having show potential right in the ad. When you find a puppy you like, email the breeder and ask if the puppy has the same bloodline as your local dogs. If the answer is no, you are on your way to fulfilling your dream.

Tip: Reviews of Puppies for Sale Online

You've talked to a few local breeders, talked to online breeders by email and have asked for references from both, but you're still hesitant about making a final decision. If only there was something else you could do to feel more secure about buying puppies for sale online. Actually, there is a great feature on puppyfind.com that helps people find out about the experience other people have had with a breeder who uses that site to advertise puppies. When you pull up a puppy listing, you will notice that there are stars beside the seller's name and a link to reviews that have been given by previous buyers. Each breeder can have up to five stars. They are calculated by the star ratings given by each buyer who writes a review of his or her experience with the breeder and his or her new puppy. If you notice a breeder has less than five stars, check the reviews, as some people are delighted with their dog, but gave the breeder less than five star ratings. If you click on the link to reviews, you can read the actual reviews. In them, you can find out how helpful the breeder was during the entire process, how the puppy arrived and whether the buyer was happy with the quality and health of his or her new friend.

Tip: Shop Virtually for Real Puppies

You've been trying to find puppies in the local paper and are downright frustrated. After weeks of searching, you finally found a breeder in the classifieds, only to have the entire litter sold before you could get to the kennel to take a look at them. How can you find the puppy of your dreams if you can't find any puppies at all? The answer is as close as your computer. You can shop for puppies near you online by using a site like puppyfind.com and limiting the search results to local puppies. Options like searching for dogs by a certain characteristic or size make it easy to narrow down choices if you aren't sure what breed you want to get. Of course, if you absolutely don't want to shop for puppies online, you can keep pouncing on the paper boy before he gets the Sunday edition out of his paper bag, but keep in mind that finding a puppy online and buying it online are two very different things. Finding local puppies online means you can go look at the puppies in person and will be able to meet the parents. Of course, you should still check references, just as you would with a breeder who isn't local.
